Abyssal Anglerfish are deeply acclaimed for an array of anomalous attributes: their built-in bioluminescence, their needle-toothed maw, their nearly unfathomable distance from the faintest reaches of the sunlit realm... Perhaps most special of all is their firmly unorthodox method of propagating by way of sexual parasitism. Anglerfish males, considerably smaller and less imposing than their female counterparts, will often spend their lives sniffing out companionship through the mostly neverending void. They will rely on her for sustenance, thus may die if they fail to find her in time. Those that do procure a mate will become increasingly detachable; as they bite onto her body the distinctions between them begin to dissolve, gradually forming the two into one symbiotic organism connected by blood.

*Only some anglerfish mate this way.
